

Zotero-TTS fixture A, page one. This document exists only to be read aloud by a test. It has several paragraphs, and every paragraph has several sentences. The first sentence of each paragraph is short. The later sentences are a little longer, so that a word-level highlight has room to move across the line.

The second paragraph talks about nothing in particular. A reader that skips by sentence should land on the start of this sentence, and then on the start of the next one. A reader that skips by paragraph should land here, at the beginning of the second paragraph, and then at the beginning of the third. Speed is measured in multiples of the natural pace.

The third paragraph is the last one on this page. It mentions the number forty-two once, and the color of the sky twice: the sky is blue, and at night the sky is dark. When the page ends, playback should continue on the next page without a pause longer than a sentence break.

Fixture A, page two. Resuming should bring the reader back to the sentence it left off on, not to the top of the page. The stored position is a single point, the center of the first rectangle of that sentence.

This is the final paragraph of fixture A. It has three sentences. This is the third one, and the document ends here.